Owing to important data having come to my hands after these notes were in press, I am sending them out incomplete, but with guards, bound in, for a chart, showing the English Generations, and for some few additional pages, which will be arranged, I hope, before the end of the year. In these I plan, to show the connection between the Suffolk and New England families, and to utilize any data which recipients of these notes may send in before October, 1899.

THE MOODY GENEALOGY.

N.B.—The name now commonly spelt Moody is variously spelt in the ancient manuscripts, wills, registers, and other documents to which I have had access and apparently without system, certainly without intention to discriminate between families, as I have found several spellings in one will, and on one page of a register. The following spellings are common, viz., Modi, Modie, Mody, Modye, Moudye, Mowdye, Moddy, Moddye, Moody, Moodye, Moode, Moodie, Mooddy, Mude, Muday. Lower, in his Essays on Family Nomenclature, identified the name with "Mud," while elsewhere the same authority interprets it as signifying brave or valiant. Throughout these notes, for the sake of brevity, I have used the letter M. for the name in all forms.

My original purpose in tracing the Moodys of East Anglia was to discover the exact connections between William Moody, of Ipswich, who emigrated on the ship "Mary and John," in 1633, and Edmond Mowdye, of Bury St. Edmunds, whose arms, granted in 1541, have been borne by descendants of William Moody, in America, during the past two hundred and fifty years. William Moody's parentage I have not yet (Feb., 1899) been able to determine. A writer has, without naming his authority, stated that he came from Wales, I am unable to find any evidence in support of this statement, but much which is directly opposed to it. The late Rev. Phineas Moody, who very carefully studied the matter in America, says that William, John, and Henry, went to America at about the same time, and that William was a native of Ipswich, Co. Suffolk, this seems to me most probable for, while I am unable to obtain evidence in the form of a baptism entry, the very strong evidence of the arms borne by his descendants constantly from that time I consider almost conclusive, especially as William and his sons were men whose lives would negative the suspicion that they would appropriate an honour or dignity not absolutely their right. John Moody above referred to was certainly of Suffolk, he was 3rd son of George of Moulton, and married Sarah Doe, at St. James' Church, Bury St. Edmunds, by license, 8th Sep. 1617. He had several children born in Bury, and buried there in infancy. Henry, or Sir Henry, was son of Sir Henry and Lady Deborah Moody, who emigrated 1636, they were of Garesden, in Wiltshire, and bore arms in no way resembling those of the Suffolk Moodys.

THE ARMS AND THEIR GRANTEE.

On the 6th Oct. in xxxii. Henry VIII. (1541) a grant of Arms was made to EDMOND MOWDYE, of Bury St. Edmunds, in Co. Suffolk, as follows:—"Arg. on a chevron "sa. engrailled, between 3 trefoils slipped vert, as many lozenges or. On a chief az. two clouds, "out of every cloud an arm issuant sleeved or porfled gu. the sleeve apparent at the hands arg. "supporting a rose gu." (Tudor rose.)

N.B.—Both in the blazon and the drawing at the Heralds' College is added "Crowned with "an imperial Crown," and in each this is struck out.

"Crest.—Upon a helmet 2 woodhouse arms dexter gu, sinister vert in cross holding in "hand a falcheon arg. hilted and hafted or. mantled gu. doubled arg."

These arms evidently refer to an incident in the life of Mowdye the importance of which cannot seem trivial to any student of history, for it happened in 1524, before Henry VIII. was enamoured of Anne Boleyn, and is referred to in "The Penny Magazine of the Society for the "Diffusion of Useful Knowledge," No. 161, 4 October, 1834, p. 392, in an article on "Hawking."

"Henry VIII. practised the gentle craft until he became too unwieldly. We are told by the "old Chronicler, Hall, that, on one occasion, our wife killing King was well nigh losing his life "through his love of the sport. It was the custom not only to cast off the falcon and follow on "horseback, but also, where the ground was broken, intersected by water or marshes, or covered "with wood, to pursue the pastime on foot. In the latter case each sportsman carried a stout "pole, to aid him in jumping over rivulets and ditches. Now one day, while Henry was hawking "in this manner, at Hitchin, in Hertfordshire, while vaulting over a ditch, his pole broke, and he "fell head downwards into the mud, which almost smothered him and there he would have died, but "for one John Moody (? John), a serving man, who, happening to be near, leaped into the ditch and "rescued the King. 'And so,' says old Hall, 'God in his goodness preserved hym.'" Had these "Diffusers of Useful Knowledge" been a trifle more accurate in consulting "Old Hall" they would have found that it was Edmund not John Mowdye who in 1524 saved the much marrying murderer. Hall writes, "The xvi. yere, the jeoperdy the kyng was in. In this yere the kyng folowing "of his hauke lept ouer a diche beside Hychyn, with a polle and the polle brake, so that if one "Edmond Mody, a foteman, had not lept into the water, & lift vp his hed, whiche was fast in the "clay he had been drouned: but God of his goodnes preserued him." We have here the arms of Moody holding up (the Tudor King in the mud) the Tudor rose. Again, this incident is referred to in a book called "Prince protecting Providence, set out in the year 1682, page 4," this note I find in Davey's Mss., but the book with such a remarkable title I am as yet unable to trace. Davey further states, without qualification, that the arms were granted by Henry VIII. to "Edmond Mowdye for "his miraculously saving his life when leaping over a ditch with a pole which brake; that if the said "Edmond had not leapt into ye water & lift up the King's head, he had drowned, for which he was "rewarded, after which he left the court & lived at St. Edmunds Bury." G. P. R. James in his novel, "Darnley," refers to this rescue in Chap. xxii.

"Foteman" and "serving man" must not be confounded with "footman" or "servant" of to-day; James appreciates this in representing Moody in "Darnley" as Sir Osborne Maurice, and the evidence would seem strong that Moody was a Suffolk gentleman of property, holding a position at Court equivalent to the present rank of equerry.

Authorities.—These notes have been compiled from the various Mss. in the British Museum bearing upon the family, and from wills and parish registers which I have carefully consulted and copied. While the registers of 380 parishes have been examined, I regret to say that a few have been placed out of my reach by the avarice of their custodians. As a rule I have met with every courtesy from the clergy of East Anglia, to whom I feel greatly indebted for much valuable help.

It is said that "Handkerchief Moody" had the misfortune, in his youth, to cause by accident the death of a companion, and that because of this he always veiled his face with a silk handkerchief—hence the name.

WOOD DITTON (CAMBRIDGESHIRE).

Edmund M., m. Agnes Clerke, 26 May, 1595
Elizabeth M., the da. of Edmund M., bp. 27 Feb., 1627.

N.B.—Owing to the condition of the register and the writing, it is difficult to determine if in the last entry the name is Moode or Woode.

NEWTON (SUDBURY).

The registers here contain no mention of M. though they date from 1558, but the pulpit has deeply cut on one panel "Orate p̄ aia," on the next panel similarly cut, "Richi Modi," on the next panel of much more modern wood and lettering, "Et leticie," and the next panel, now a door of more recent construction, bears no carving.

QUERY.—Was it ever complete? The early registers of Newton are full of entries of the Alston family. A grandson of Richard M., of Moulton, mentions cousin Jonas Alston in his will. Richard M., m., previous to 1558, Anne (surname unknown). She, as his widow, probably m. Edward Coult, and shortly after died.
